How First-Generation Students Spend Their Time:

Clues to Academic and Social Integration

by

Heather R. Rudd

Thesis submitted to the Faculty of

Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of

Master of Arts in Education

Department of Educational Leadership and Policy Studies

Approved:

_______________________
Joan B. Hirt, Chairperson

_______________________  _______________________
Karen E. Sanders         Diana M. Ridgwell

April 19, 2006

Blacksburg, Virginia

Keywords: First-generation students, Academic Integration, Social Integration
How First-Generation Students Spend Their Time:
Clues to Academic and Social Integration
Heather R. Rudd

Abstract

This study explored the activities in which first-generation students engage that might promote academic and social integration. Additionally, differences in activities by race were examined. Participants included fifteen Caucasian and fifteen Multicultural first-generation, first-year students. Respondents maintained logs of their daily academic and social activities for a two-week period during their first semester on campus. The logs yielded both quantitative and qualitative data.

The results revealed several interesting findings. First, first-generation students engaged in a number of academic behaviors that often contribute to academic integration and success. Although they were not always confident in their abilities as a student, first-generation participants attended most of their classes, completed assignments, participated in class discussions, and visited their professors to seek assistance. Second, although informants seemed to devote more time to academic pursuits, they did take time to enjoy conversations and activities with peers and attend meetings and events on campus. Third, Caucasian and Multicultural first-generation students were nearly equally involved in academic pursuits. However, Caucasian students focused on developing personal relationships with those who support their success, while Multicultural students focused more on results and achievement. Fourth, both Caucasian and Multicultural students found ways to be involved socially on campus, but Caucasian students were more comfortable describing their time spent out of the classroom.
In general, the students in this study were not as much at risk as results from prior research on first-generation students has suggested they might be. In their first semester, they found ways to participate successfully in the academic and social environments of college.
Acknowledgements

This project started with the smallest of ideas before graduate school began and has since developed through the encouragement, support, energy, and time of numerous individuals. Above all I offer thanks and praise to God for all of the blessings and opportunities I have had in my life and for His love, faithfulness, grace, and mercy.

My sincerest gratitude to my thesis advisor and committee chair Joan Hirt who reviewed my chapters in record time and has offered thoughtful feedback and support for this project since its earliest “for the purposes of this class” stage. I truly appreciate Karen Sanders and Diana Ridgwell for graciously sharing their time as committee members. I would also like to acknowledge those who emailed their students about my study, as well as the Graduate Student Assembly for providing funding.

A big thank you to my cohort members for all of the times we have shared over the past two years, both in and out of the classroom. Best wishes in everything you do! My appreciation also extends to the HESA faculty members for supporting my academic endeavors and personal and professional efforts.

As I have been away from family and old friends, many helped make Blacksburg home for the past two years. Thank you to the staff of Career Services for investing in me the past two years and allowing me to ask questions and grow. Harper, thank you for great late night talks and helping me make time to relax. “Ike,” you are an amazing woman, and I am going to miss having you next door. “KNay,” you have been there for me on so many occasions and have seen me at my best and worst. I am blessed to have you all in my life!

My deepest love and respect for my parents who have always supported me in every decision I have made. Thank you for providing me with the opportunity to be a first-generation student. Kristen and Katie, I always miss you and love you. I also want to thank all of my friends who have been so patient and understanding with the limited time I had to give them over the past two years. “Nave,” your care packages and notes were always so timely and made many a day.

Finally, this study could not have been possible without a significant time commitment from 18 first-year, first-generation students. Thank you for everything you shared with me! Best wishes as you continue your education.
Table of Contents

Abstract........................................................................................................................................... ii

Acknowledgements........................................................................................................................ iv

Table of Contents........................................................................................................................... vi

List of Tables ................................................................................................................................. ix

List of Appendixes........................................................................................................................ x

Chapter 1   Introduction .....................................................................................................................1

Purpose of the Study .................................................................................................................... 7

Research Questions ..................................................................................................................... 7

Significance of the Study ............................................................................................................ 8

Delimitations................................................................................................................................. 9

Organization of the Study ...........................................................................................................10

Chapter 2   Literature Review ..........................................................................................................11

Academic Integration .................................................................................................................... 11

Students in General ................................................................................................................... 11

Race............................................................................................................................................. 13

First-Generation Students ....................................................................................................... 15

Social Integration .......................................................................................................................... 18

Students in General ................................................................................................................... 18

Race............................................................................................................................................. 19

First-Generation Students ....................................................................................................... 21

Conclusion .................................................................................................................................... 22

Chapter 3   Methods ..........................................................................................................................26
List of Tables

Table 1 Demographic Characteristics of the Sample..............................................................51
Table 2 Themes Related to Academic Behaviors by Section and Item......................................53
Table 3 Themes Related to Social Activities by Section and Item............................................77
List of Appendices

Appendix A  Recruiting Advertisement ................................................................. 129
Appendix B  Participant Eligibility Screening Checklist ...................................... 131
Appendix C  Log Data Collection Instrument ...................................................... 134
Appendix D  Guidelines and Instructions for Log ................................................... 139
Appendix E  General Experiences Supplemental Questions ................................ 144
Appendix F  IRB Approval Letter ........................................................................... 147