

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This dissertation begins a life-long journey. Initially, I thank Professor Richard Burian and Professor Gary Downey for allowing STS to grow and prosper at Virginia Tech. To the members of my committee I thank: Professor Burt Moyer for his trust during my proposal defense and providing a source of confidence; Professor Skip Fuhrman for making sociology matter; Professor Richard Burian for his rare combination of a joy and keen intellect; Professor Steve Fuller for his formidable inspiration from afar; and, most profoundly, Professor Joseph Pitt for his constant oversight in a journey which began almost twenty years ago.

I take this dissertation as the second payment on a debt I owe to students and colleagues in the English department, colleagues in STS, friends and family. Specifically, I thank the students in my English 3764 classes at Tech from 1993-1998. As well, I thank the English department for "a place to come to." To my student colleagues past and present who help me to go on through their scholarly example and personal concern; I thank especially David Ferro, Amy Crumpton and the members of Pitt's "fraternal order." To my friends in Washington and Richmond – I owe you my sanity. My great privilege has been to make dear friends in Blacksburg – to those moving and have moved – Jane, Gary, Mary, John, Scott, Matt, and David – thanks for the unquestioned support. To my mother, and family, who never doubted. Finally, for my father.
