As a final step in the development of the plan, the library was rotated ninety degrees to face the classroom tower. Simultaneously, the main performance hall’s orientation was rotated one hundred eighty degrees to match the orientation of the plaza. This accomplished a number of things: it blocked off the eastern edge of the plan from encroachment from any future development; it completed the arms around the empty space of the plaza; it gave a prominence to the performance plaza which prompted the development of the facade of the classroom tower (baffles to catch sound from the exterior stage beneath the library); it set up a tension between the library (place for the study of finished works) and the classroom tower (place for the learning and rehearsal of works); and it finalized the role of the connective wing between the library and the classroom tower (faculty and administrative offices).
