The stone wall places the house at a point within the forest from which to rise amongst the trees. The vertical stone stair enclosure breaks on one side to allow light and on the other side to allow access to the rooms of the house. The stone chimney allows a place for a hearth at three of the five levels. There are several courtyard and balcony spaces at different heights around the house. Each space has a different perspective of being within the forest.
trees which barely conceal a lake in the valley. It is a place to remember childhood summer camps. One can recall playing and exploring in the woods, swimming and boating in the lake.
singing and telling ghost stories by the campfire, then falling asleep to the sounds of the forest at night. Continuing along the path as it enters a small glade, one can begin to hear the bubbling
