Adolescent Girls’ Body-Narratives and Co-Constructed Critical Interpretations

by

Kimberly L. Oliver

Dissertation submitted to the Faculty of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University in partial fulfillment of the requirements of the degree of

Doctor of Philosophy

in

Curriculum and Instruction

ADVISORY COMMITTEE

George M. Graham, Chairman

Rosary Lalik

Kerry Redican

Janet Sawyers

Kusum Singh

May 6, 1997

Blacksburg, Virginia

Key Words: Adolescent girls, body, teaching, culture, oppression, transformation, physical education, narrative.
Abstract

Narrative analysis, a form of narrative inquiry, uses stories to frame and describe how people interpret and construct the meanings of their lives. Stories connect us with our past, help us to understand our present, and offer vision of possible futures. People live and create their lives through the stories they see, hear, tell, internalize, and hope for. The interpretation of narrative is not about certainties or standards, but rather about the multiplicity of perspectives and possibilities that can be constructed to make experience understandable. Critical interpretation of narrative can thus be a transformative process; a process being so crucial to the health of adolescent girls in Western culture. This study explores how four adolescent girls, and one researcher, together, interpreted and constructed the meanings of their bodies. The journey connects the researcher's struggle to find more democratic and empowering forms of inquiry, with the stories four eighth grade girls, diverse in race, social class, religion, and skin color, tell about how they experience and see their bodies in culture, in relation to others, and as them selves.

All four girls are learning to create and desire an "image" of an ideal woman, and thus are beginning to objectify their bodies to be "looked at" by others. Image was a predominant interpretive frame for constructing meaning of the body for all four girls. Yet race, particularly visual racial representations, was also a predominant interpretive frame for the two African American, and one African American-Indian girls.
Table of Contents

Chapter 1. Introduction: The Beginning of a Journey .........................................1
  Physical Education: How we Have Documented The Bodies of Middle School Girls
  ..............................................................................................................................2

Chapter 2. A Journey Into Methodology: Discovering Meaning and Mapping a Road....14
  Power of Narrative .........................................................................................18
  Types of Narrative Inquiry ...........................................................................21
  An Interpretive Framework: A Journey Toward Understanding...................27
  Criteria For Quality .......................................................................................28
  Entry Into Their World ..................................................................................30
  Making a Choice: Which Girls' Voices Will be Heard?...................................33
  Forming Relationships: Sharing Our Stories With Others .........................40
  The Map of Our Journey: A Responsive and Emerging Method..................45

Chapter 3. Fashion: Learning to Create and Desire an Image ............................50
  The Story Behind "Fashion In" and "Fashion Out" .......................................52
  Healthy Hair ...................................................................................................53
  Clothes and Shoes .........................................................................................56
  Body Shape .....................................................................................................59
  Images of Femininity ......................................................................................61
  Looking "Right" and "Normal" .......................................................................63
  Resisting the Images of the Perfect Woman ..................................................66

Chapter 4. Unveiling the Private: Journals, Individual Voices, Silenced Dialogues......72
  Khalilah .........................................................................................................76
  Alysa ..............................................................................................................84
  Dauntai .........................................................................................................96
  Nicole .........................................................................................................105

Chapter 5. Creating Critical Spaces: Imagining and Exploring Alternative Possibilities..114
  Exploring the Paths of Development ...........................................................115
  Imagining and Alternative Society: Exploring Beyond the Actual .................123
  Being Noticed ...............................................................................................130
  Returning to the Path of Right and Normal..................................................131

Chapter 6. Color Blind..........................................................................................134
  Exploring Language and Difference: Shades Within the Image.....................141
  Trailing Racial Identity: Returning to "Fashion In" .........................................146

Epilogue .............................................................................................................152

References .......................................................................................................158

Appendices .......................................................................................................168
Acknowledgments

While there have been many people who have influenced my life, and more specifically, who have helped and supported me while I grew both personally and professionally over the past three years, I would like to acknowledge a few.

First, I would like to thank Dr.'s Kusum Singh, Kerry Redican, and Janet Sawyers for serving on my committee. I have appreciated your comments and contributions to my learning.

A very special thank you to my advisor and teacher, Dr. George Graham. The spaces you created within our "community of learners" to learn, think, question, listen, reflect, and explore what I was passionate about will always be treasured in my heart. I appreciate, and deeply respect the confidence you must have had to give me the freedom I needed to pursue my interests in ways that were meaningful to me. You are an educator in the finest and truest sense. Thank you.

To Dr. Rosary Lalik I want to thank you for being instrumental in my dissertation process. I am grateful for our weekly meetings, the time you spent listening and talking with me, and the ways with which you continually offered the encouragement and support I needed throughout. Your wisdom, perception, and very special ability to listen helped me to find ways to express what was important to me. You modeled a way of mentoring that I hope to share with my students in the future. I have the deepest respect and appreciation for you, as you are an inspiring and thoughtful educator and scholar. Thank you.

I would also like to thank Dr. Jim Garrison for his support and encouragement over the past three years. The time I spent in your class my first year was one of the most profound experiences of my educational career. Your class created the space for me to begin naming what I was passionate about learning. Our conversations over coffee or a pitcher or beer have helped me to continue to think and question beyond. Your influence will go with me forever. Thank you.

And to one of the most important people in my graduate career, my dear friend, colleague, and running partner, Lynn Bustle. Your thoughtfulness, caring, and very special appreciation of the aesthetic qualities in life have enriched my ways of seeing, asking, and understanding. For two years our daily runs and conversations have helped me grow in ways I am now beginning to realize and appreciate more than words can say. Your influence in my life can be seen laced throughout my work. Our collaboration will always have a very special meaning and place in my heart. Thank you.

To my parents, Pat and Joe Oliver, thank you for your continual support, guidance, and encouragement as I packed up myself and the Gato, and moved across the country to chase a dream and find my place in society. While we did not get to see each other as much as I would have liked, my time here has been both important and necessary. I love you both dearly.

And finally, to the people who were at the very center, the teacher who opened his classroom to me, thank you. I enjoyed my days with you, and learned a great deal. And to Khalilah, Dauntai, Alysa, and Nicole, I dedicate this to you. You are four very special young people. Thank you.